Behind the scenes at Simon's Wood

A mixture of broadleaf woodland, pine forest and open heathland, Simon's Wood is a popular natural beauty spot in Finchampstead, Berkshire. It's looked after by a small team of National Trust Rangers based at Runnymede, along with a large and dedicated group of volunteers. If you're local, you may have noticed the changes taking place within the woodlands recently, as we work to improve the quality of the woodland for wildlife and visitors alike.

Our aim at Simon's Wood is to promote a habitat of mixed native woodland, with a mosaic of variably-aged tree species and ground flora that can support a high level of animal diversity. At the moment the woodland is dominated by an invasive plant species called Rhododendron ponticum. This distinctive, purple-flowered shrub makes it very difficult for new trees or plants to establish or grow - and that's why we're progressively removing it.

The ponticum problem

R. ponticum, a native of southern Europe and Southwest Asia, was introduced as an ornamental garden plant to the UK in the mid-1700s. Because it's able to rapidly reproduce and produce seeds, it has spread through many parts of the British countryside and become extremely dominant. A large body of research shows that R. ponticum has little to no benefit for British biodiversity, and in fact has many adverse effects. While on the surface it may seem like the rhododendron provides good cover for wildlife to hide in, in reality very little wildlife will be making use of it. It has been shown to reduce the numbers of arthworms, birds and plants, and to hinder the regenerative capacity of a site, leading to a reduction in the biodiversity of the area.

Root benefits

While the main reasons for removing rhododendron from Simon's Wood are to improve conditions for native wildlife and enhance biodiversity, there are also several other benefits.

- In 2015, a professional survey of all the iconic Wellingtonia trees along the Simon's Wood area of Wellingtonia Avenue found that pedestrian footfall along the path next to these trees was causing serious compaction to their root zone, damaging their health. By removing nearby rhododendron, we've been able to relocate this footpath through the woods, relieving the pressure to the Wellingtonia trees and helping them stay healthy for years to come.
- Clearing large areas of rhododendron has also improved the condition of some of the wet and muddy paths, as more light has been able to reach the woodland floor, drying it out more quickly. Importantly for visitors, the car park is now also much more open and visible, deterring antisocial behaviour and creating a safer environment for everyone.

There is still much rhododendron to clear, but the progress made so far has been encouraging, and it will be exciting to see how the woodlands develop and the biodiversity changes without the dominance of the rhododendron.

The Parish Council has developed a 4 mile circular walk starting from Simon's Wood - this is available to download from our website or from the Parish Office - see below.
